IN THE NEWS

David Gordon (Arts and Science, Department of Geography and Planning). Brandon Sun: Major changes on the horizon. Professor Gordon has research featured about the number of people who commute from suburbs in Canada.

Warren Mabee (Arts and Science, Department of Geography and Planning, School of Policy Studies). CBC News Network: High oil prices could speed up Canada's transition to renewable energy, experts say. Dr. Mabee says high oil prices should spur investment in renewables because the oil markets can be too volatile, but this shift won't happen overnight.

Gentrification as Perceived and Experienced – Examining the Health of the Gentrified

Gentrification refers to the process of urban neighborhood change due to influx of more affluent people and households. It is usually accompanied by increase in rent, shifts in neighborhood demographic characteristics, and reshaping of economic and cultural landscape. Although gentrification may be considered as a stage of urban development, it is often controversial for urban politics and planning when the well-being of the gentrified is concerned. For a gentrified neighborhood and the people who live through the process, gentrification is an issue of housing, culture, and health. Looking through a social justice lens, Dr. Lu argues for a people-centered framework when examining the exposure to gentrification and its health impacts. This seminar talk will also discuss empirical findings on health impacts of gentrification in the east part of Austin, Texas.

A stylized illustration of a winter scene. In the background, a red house with white windows and a red door is partially visible through the bare branches of trees. The ground is covered in snow. In the foreground, several dark tree trunks are visible, some with red buckets hanging from them, suggesting a maple syrup collection scene. The overall color palette is muted, with greys, browns, and reds.
