Dr. Nathan McClintock is a geographer whose research and teaching engages with urban political ecology, critical urbanism, and food systems planning to examine the intersections of urbanization, social and environmental change. He has also researched the socio-ecological dynamics of urban soil contamination and its implications for environmental justice. His work appears in the Annals of the American Association of Geographers, Geoforum, Urban Geography, Agriculture and Human Values, Landscape and Urban Planning, and the Journal of the American Planning Association, among others. He has a Ph.D. in Geography from the University of California, Berkeley, an M.S. in Crop Science/Agroecology, North Carolina State University and a B.A. in French, University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill. Dr. McClintock is on sabbatical in Montreal for the 2018-2019 academic year.
