

The Department of Political Studies and the CIDP present

CORPORATE SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY
AS A DISCURSIVE ALIBI:
QUESTIONING THE CSR-DEVELOPMENT
NEXUS IN AN AFRICAN CONTEXT

Nathan Andrews
Queen's University

Tuesday, April 5, 2016
12:00 – 1:00 pm
Robert Sutherland Hall, Rm. 448

*Light lunch served starting at 11:45 am

Nathan Andrews recently completed his PhD in Political Science at the University of Alberta and is currently a Banting postdoctoral fellow at Queen's University. Nathan is conducting research that focuses on the international political economy of natural resources in Africa with a current focus on the socio-political dynamics of oil and gas extraction in Ghana. He has also conducted research on and/or taught courses at Queen's on topics such as global governance and global norm proliferation, foreign aid, international development policies towards African countries, international regimes/institutions, and International Relations theory. Some of his peer-reviewed publications have appeared or are forthcoming in such journals as Third World Quarterly, International Journal, World Futures, Africa Today, Resources Policy, and Business & Society Review. His two co-edited books are Africa Yesterday, Today and Tomorrow: Exploring the Multi-dimensional Discourses on 'Development' (Cambridge Scholars, 2013), and Millennium Development Goals in Retrospect: Africa's Development Beyond 2015 (Springer, 2015).